

While moose may seem inseparable during their sparring matches, they often curtail their interaction or even part soon thereafter. We were therefore very surprised to find two cows who were engaged in faux head-to-head battles over the course of three days. Blacktip and Corded were tireless in their long encounter. Blacktip dominated as she laid her ears back, licked her lips, lowered her head, reared, and kicked. Corded ran off in defeat at the end of the first round, but soon returned for more mock abuse. Both ambled quietly off in affectionate unison at the end of each day. But bulls spar too of course...
