

Moose calves do not have spots like other members of the deer family, but are born instead with light brown wooly coats. Their coloring serves them very well in the woody willows and grasses where they tend to hide. But two-month old Marie, who is enjoying a bit of frolic in the water, will soon see her coat transition through a moth-eaten appearance to smooth, dark fur. During these first few months, she lacks many of the unique characteristics of adult moose, such as the long face and extended nose and lips. But she is certainly very adorable. But mature bulls sometimes attack the water aggressively...
